Navigation Law: Present and Future Prospects in the Globalisation Century

In today's world, law is more and more influenced by economics, and a globalised market requires a uniform regulation of international traffic.
For several reasons, maritime, air navigation and transport law must play a more and more important role, in order to better understand the market. This role is justified by the «globalised» origin of this legal area, by the natural connection with the old and the new lex mercatoria, and also by its system of legal sources and by the historical precedence alternation of customs, substantive law and codifications. The article intends to focus on such a role in our time and to analyse how the complexity of the present society and of globalisation have changed today's world and to sketch future prospects.
